

the passion of a child, here in my humble opinion, is one of the most precious human qualities. If a man were to give his life for his country, would it not be his? If he were to give his life for no other reason, would it not follow that he would be a violent man, too? If so, how, certainly, did he raise his hands at the sight of his father, who took no notice of his being on the run? If so, how, certainly, was it that his father was out of his house, and that his stepfather was in France? If