

"A true gentleman." "Then I trust that you will find the papers before you are all correct." "Yes, I did just that. The name of the salesman is a very strange one. There is never any commonality between us. When I call I am forced to pronounce strange names." "It is, indeed, the Fowler," she answered, glancing at me with her eye-contact sometimes excellent, while Holmes was always amused at the ease with which she glanced at his papers. "License and advertisement," she remarked, "are, I fanc
