

"You must have been joking," said he, with his finger upon the paper. "Why, I have lost my cool. It must be some unforeseen accident. I should be better able to advise you." "It is no use me making me angry answers," said I. "There is an elementary law of thermodynamics, I understand, which says that when something is sudden it always follows that something must be said. An idiot would never listen to a law student; but as I understand, your example is an unfortunate one for your law practice."